Amputations, the medicine is taken up by the pores of the skin, thereby reaching the seat of the disease at once, and its progress is arrested before it can become general. It is not absorbed into the system, and it does not enter the blood. It is not a medicine, and it does not require a prescription. It is a cure, and it is a cure by absorption.

Reminiscences of the Third Tennessee Cavalry.

BY ADJUTANT WILL A. M'TEER.

NO. VII.

ON THE RETREAT.

We were now on the retreat, with a long, rugged road through the mountainous portion of Eastern Kentucky before us, and but little to strengthen the inner man on the wearisome way, the country affording little save brandy, which was in abundance.

The first day was spent on the road from Cumberland Gap to Cumberland Ford, camping at the latter place at night. In this connection it might be well to mention that which, to the mind not versed in hydrology, is a curiosity and hard to understand. There are an abundance of springs at Cumberland Gap. Those on the Tennessee and Virginia side are excellent, cold water, while on the Kentucky side they are not good at all. This added to the suffering of that memorable retreat.

The third night we camped on Goose Creek, about the Goose Creek Salt Works. There had been no rain for a long time, and the creek was so low it did not afford running water, but stood in ponds here and there. Hungry and tired, we stopped and hastily cooked our rice, using the water from the creek; but, to our astonishment, the sharp gnawing of hunger did not whet our appetites sufficiently for us to eat what had been cooked. The water was salt! Not the pleasant, salty given by the sea, but the filthy, stagnant taste that could not be endured, so the rice had to be thrown away, while we slept on very empty stomachs.

Corn was now getting too hard to roast, so the next means of using it was by what was known in the army as the "Armstrong mill." This was made by melting the solder from a canteen, thus giving two pieces of tin shaped like a turtle's shell.

They were then fastened together, by punching small holes in them, with a nail or point of a bayonet, so one canteen made two excellent "Armstrong Mills." These were carried in the haversack, and, on the march, each soldier kept a sharp eye on the tin fields, and gathered all that could be found or easily carried, so when night came, and the command would bivouac, the sounds of the "mills" could be heard at all times through the night.

On the 21st of September we passed through Manchester. Col. McCord's brigade had been sent out to this place, and, on the 20th, they had gathered some flour, and on the 22nd we got a divide, and at night cooked some bread, being the first bread, except that made from bran, straw, wheat, etc., at the Gap, that we had had for three weeks. We were told, however, that there was a quantity of flour ground for us at Proctor, a village some distance ahead. This was cheering to us; because, when one lives three weeks in health without the staff of life, he is ready to give audible smiles when the most remote promise of its return is made. Pushing forward eagerly, we came in the neighborhood of Proctor about noon, September 23rd, and our hopes were heightened, upon receiving the information that the mill, flour and all had been burned, and the place was held by a strong force of rebels. The last part turned out to be untrue, and it was well for them that it was. Two thousand men as hungry as General Morgan's command, to meet with this kind of disappointment at such a time, naturally enraged them to such a pitch that a fight would really be a matter of course. It was, however, a fight that was not to be. We were told, however, that way, while the men of other regiments looked so. Several very important military evolutions were performed, the place surrounded, batteries run up, the volunteers stationed so that they were bearing on the little town, ready for the bloody fray. The mill had been burned, that could be seen, and now a hungry and enraged army stood ready to avenge the wrong by storming the city. Cautionably the lines were closed and brought nearer the fatal place. At length the advance ventured into the town, and learned that eleven rebels had been there long enough to burn the mill and let us know that they were there. That morning I had one small cake of bread, and it was all I got for the next twenty-four hours. On this retreat my feet got in the same condition they were when going to the army. The soles were bruised and swollen, and to add severity to pain, my shoes burst, and when coming to streams had to wade, then, with wet feet, walking in the sand, the moisture pattered the sand and worked it into the sore parts, so that the weight of the body at each step forced bloody matter from the feet, and, generally on the hard road, leaving my tracks in bloody mud. In this condition Major L. M. Blackburn, then acting Quartermaster, did me a kindness I can never forget. He was a stranger to me, I never having met him until at Cumberland Gap, but I presume he had noticed my condition. I had enlisted for the war and would not complain, and kept my place in the ranks, notwithstanding the pain caused by marching. I never want to see Major Blackburn in the condition I was, but if he ever is, I want to be able to place him in a palace car the remainder of his journey. As we marched along he gathered the horses and mules he could, so one night, just after we had halted for the night, he came to me and told me to come around next morning and he would turn me a horse. The next morning came, I was very thankful for his kindness, and didn't want to trouble him at all, so I went to where some horses and mules were hitched, but others who could get around more rapidly had all the horses and mules, except one little stubborn mule. I tried to catch it, but it would pull away from me and cut capers as long as possible, then fluting that I was about to take hold of the rope it would turn its business end at me and go kicking. I then went to Major Blackburn and told him that I could not catch that mule. "What mule?" he asked. I told him that he said I had something to ride if I came around, and every animal was gone but the one mule! "Yes," he replied, "But I didn't say you could have a d—d mule! I have a horse for you, tied out from the others!" And so he had, and a good one, too. Mounted upon this horse I joined about thirty others of our command who had horses and we acted rather as an advance guard. This was rather a novelty in a company. Many of us had never ridden a horse, and I had neither, but tied a musket strap
